Tabled by: Verdes Equo

Demands

Insert from line 41 to 43:

security partnerships change, the EU must strengthen its capacity to protect its people. Security also means food sovereignty—reducing Europe's strategic dependence on agricultural imports through resilient, plant-rich food systems and robust food stocks—alongside resilience to climate disasters and cyberattacks, and communities that withstand crises and recover together, as well as investing

Explanation / Comment

side note: Plant-based food systems require drastically less land, water, energy, and synthetic inputs per calorie and gram of protein than industrial animal agriculture—which currently absorbs around 70% of EU plant proteins and forces Europe to rely heavily on imported feed and fertilisers. This is now recognized as a hard security risk: the UK intelligence community's 2026 national security assessment (Global biodiversity loss, ecosystem collapse and national security, released only after being leaked) explicitly warns that countries cannot feed their populations during supply shocks "based on current diets" and must transition toward "resilient and efficient food systems." As demonstrated by Denmark's Action Plan for Plant-Based Foods, shifting agricultural land toward crops grown directly for human consumption maximizes domestic resource efficiency, builds strategic food stocks, and turns food sovereignty into essential civilian defence infrastructure.
